Easter Sings Hope's Reprise

*"Hope" is the thing with feathers -
That perches in the soul -
And sings the tune without the words – And never stops - at all*
(Emily Dickinson)

But from where does this feathered hope migrate and perch in the soul? Who put it there? Who taught it to sing - this unceasing tune without words?

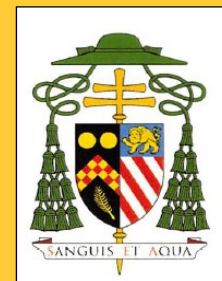

It comes from over the horizon, beyond our sight. It travels from the lands that we cannot see, down where the sun settles at night, as it prepares to push back the darkness. This enfeathered hope is conceived by the breath of dawn.

The tune it sings requires no words, for hope is cheapened by ramblings and certainties. "We have no words," they often say when grief steals all meaning. But hope, like grief, its twin, is wordless too because it cannot be contained or captured, or held by a thought, or commanded to appear. Hope arrives - singing! - singing an unceasing tune - familiar - for it has been here all along.

Easter goes by another name. Easter sings hope's reprise: that "thing with feathers - That perches in the soul - And sings the tune without the words - And never stops - at all." For the Easter song travels from over the horizon, from beyond our sight, from the lands that we cannot see, down where the sun settles at night, as it prepares to push back the darkness.

On Easter morn, we cannot help but join this wordless song. Hope, that is uncontainable, that sings unceasingly, that travels from the darkness bearing light, that journeys from the place of sleep to awaken life, that perches in our soul - this Easter promise is the still-point and purpose of everything. Easter's real name is "hope". And hope too is known by another and truer name: Christ Jesus - the light, the song, the beginning, the end, the new creation, the undeserved gift, the glorious, abiding Divine harmony, that perches in the soul and sings - and sings, and never stops - at all.
